THE PARTY COULD BE OVER FOR RECALCITRANT, JEW-HATING PALESTINIANS

Donald Trump just might have lit the spark that could end the two-state solution.

DAVID SASSON

In the international context of the 21st century, President Donald Trump’s election in the United States provides an opportunity for Israelis and Palestinians to embark on a new path of cooperation, leading to the establishment of a viable two-state solution. However, the likelihood of this happening is uncertain due to the increasing polarization of the political landscape.

Professional actors on both sides — from the Palestinian leadership to Israeli settlers — have already expressed their willingness to engage in negotiations to achieve a comprehensive solution. But the process is not without its challenges, as the current political climate in both countries is marked by a deep mistrust and skepticism.

Our heritage is worth the fight.

WE’VE LOST THE KNACK OF FINDING JOBS FOR REFUGEES

There is a world-wide and economic solution we offer if we get it right

SYDNEY NORMAN

LARRY KAMNEN

In the world of refugees, the search for employment is a key factor in determining success and failure. As the number of refugees continues to grow, it is crucial that we find innovative and effective solutions to help them reintegrate into society.

Better jobs will strengthen social cohesion

Australian Turcovic (Office of the Ombudsman, New York) has developed a world-wide and economic solution to the problem of finding jobs for refugees. His proposal involves a comprehensive set of strategies that address the root causes of refugee unemployment and offer practical ways to increase their employability.

Turcovic’s solution includes a range of measures such as vocational training, language instruction, and access to affordable childcare. These initiatives are designed to help refugees build the skills and knowledge necessary to succeed in the job market. The program also provides ongoing support to help refugees overcome the challenges they face in adapting to their new environment.

Turcovic’s approach is based on the principle that refugees are valued members of society who should be given the opportunity to contribute to their communities. By investing in their education and training, we can help them achieve their full potential and make a positive impact on both their lives and our societies.
