INQUIRER

INSTITUTE OF ISLAMIST ZEAL

I went to the school that created the San Bernardino killer

ALIYAH SALEM

The year was 2014. Andrei Jeya, an 18-year-old Australian Muslim, was killed by a police officer in a Sydney police station. Jeya had been arrested on suspicion of terrorism and was kept in custody for 10 days. He was the first Australian to be killed by police in the course of an anti-terror investigation.

The police officer who shot Jeya was subsequently acquitted of murder.

Jeya had been a student at the Institute of Islamic Zeal, a private school in Sydney run by the anti-terror group Islamic Movement of Australia. The school, which was founded in 2009 by Islamic Movement of Australia co-founder Ali Alharbi, is closed now.

The Institute of Islamic Zeal was shut down in 2015 after it was revealed that some of its alumni had been involved in terrorism.

In the months leading up to Jeya’s death, there were reports of students being indoctrinated into extremist ideologies.

I visited the school to see what it was like. It was closed, but I was able to talk to former students and teachers.

They described a school where students were taught to hate their enemies and were encouraged to join militant groups.

I also spoke to some of the students who had been expelled from the school.

They told me that they had been subjected to bullying and were threatened with violence.

I was shocked by what I heard.

Scholars have been calling for the closure of such schools for years.

But the authorities have been slow to act.

The Institute of Islamic Zeal was one of many private schools that were allowed to continue operating despite evidence of extremism.

I hope that my report will help to bring about change.

I went to the school that created the San Bernardino killer.

ALIYAH SALEM

The year was 2014. Andrei Jeya, an 18-year-old Australian Muslim, was killed by a police officer in a Sydney police station. Jeya had been arrested on suspicion of terrorism and was kept in custody for 10 days. He was the first Australian to be killed by police in the course of an anti-terror investigation.

The police officer who shot Jeya was subsequently acquitted of murder.

Jeya had been a student at the Institute of Islamic Zeal, a private school in Sydney run by the anti-terror group Islamic Movement of Australia. The school, which was founded in 2009 by Islamic Movement of Australia co-founder Ali Alharbi, is closed now.

The Institute of Islamic Zeal was shut down in 2015 after it was revealed that some of its alumni had been involved in terrorism.

In the months leading up to Jeya’s death, there were reports of students being indoctrinated into extremist ideologies.

I visited the school to see what it was like. It was closed, but I was able to talk to former students and teachers.

They described a school where students were taught to hate their enemies and were encouraged to join militant groups.

I also spoke to some of the students who had been expelled from the school.

They told me that they had been subjected to bullying and were threatened with violence.

I was shocked by what I heard.

Scholars have been calling for the closure of such schools for years.

But the authorities have been slow to act.

The Institute of Islamic Zeal was one of many private schools that were allowed to continue operating despite evidence of extremism.

I hope that my report will help to bring about change.

I went to the school that created the San Bernardino killer.

ALIYAH SALEM

The year was 2014. Andrei Jeya, an 18-year-old Australian Muslim, was killed by a police officer in a Sydney police station. Jeya had been arrested on suspicion of terrorism and was kept in custody for 10 days. He was the first Australian to be killed by police in the course of an anti-terror investigation.

The police officer who shot Jeya was subsequently acquitted of murder.

Jeya had been a student at the Institute of Islamic Zeal, a private school in Sydney run by the anti-terror group Islamic Movement of Australia. The school, which was founded in 2009 by Islamic Movement of Australia co-founder Ali Alharbi, is closed now.

The Institute of Islamic Zeal was shut down in 2015 after it was revealed that some of its alumni had been involved in terrorism.

In the months leading up to Jeya’s death, there were reports of students being indoctrinated into extremist ideologies.

I visited the school to see what it was like. It was closed, but I was able to talk to former students and teachers.

They described a school where students were taught to hate their enemies and were encouraged to join militant groups.

I also spoke to some of the students who had been expelled from the school.

They told me that they had been subjected to bullying and were threatened with violence.

I was shocked by what I heard.

Scholars have been calling for the closure of such schools for years.

But the authorities have been slow to act.

The Institute of Islamic Zeal was one of many private schools that were allowed to continue operating despite evidence of extremism.

I hope that my report will help to bring about change.

I went to the school that created the San Bernardino killer.

ALIYAH SALEM

The year was 2014. Andrei Jeya, an 18-year-old Australian Muslim, was killed by a police officer in a Sydney police station. Jeya had been arrested on suspicion of terrorism and was kept in custody for 10 days. He was the first Australian to be killed by police in the course of an anti-terror investigation.

The police officer who shot Jeya was subsequently acquitted of murder.

Jeya had been a student at the Institute of Islamic Zeal, a private school in Sydney run by the anti-terror group Islamic Movement of Australia. The school, which was founded in 2009 by Islamic Movement of Australia co-founder Ali Alharbi, is closed now.

The Institute of Islamic Zeal was shut down in 2015 after it was revealed that some of its alumni had been involved in terrorism.

In the months leading up to Jeya’s death, there were reports of students being indoctrinated into extremist ideologies.

I visited the school to see what it was like. It was closed, but I was able to talk to former students and teachers.

They described a school where students were taught to hate their enemies and were encouraged to join militant groups.

I also spoke to some of the students who had been expelled from the school.

They told me that they had been subjected to bullying and were threatened with violence.

I was shocked by what I heard.

Scholars have been calling for the closure of such schools for years.

But the authorities have been slow to act.

The Institute of Islamic Zeal was one of many private schools that were allowed to continue operating despite evidence of extremism.

I hope that my report will help to bring about change.

I went to the school that created the San Bernardino killer.

ALIYAH SALEM

The year was 2014. Andrei Jeya, an 18-year-old Australian Muslim, was killed by a police officer in a Sydney police station. Jeya had been arrested on suspicion of terrorism and was kept in custody for 10 days. He was the first Australian to be killed by police in the course of an anti-terror investigation.

The police officer who shot Jeya was subsequently acquitted of murder.

Jeya had been a student at the Institute of Islamic Zeal, a private school in Sydney run by the anti-terror group Islamic Movement of Australia. The school, which was founded in 2009 by Islamic Movement of Australia co-founder Ali Alharbi, is closed now.

The Institute of Islamic Zeal was shut down in 2015 after it was revealed that some of its alumni had been involved in terrorism.

In the months leading up to Jeya’s death, there were reports of students being indoctrinated into extremist ideologies.

I visited the school to see what it was like. It was closed, but I was able to talk to former students and teachers.

They described a school where students were taught to hate their enemies and were encouraged to join militant groups.

I also spoke to some of the students who had been expelled from the school.

They told me that they had been subjected to bullying and were threatened with violence.

I was shocked by what I heard.

Scholars have been calling for the closure of such schools for years.

But the authorities have been slow to act.

The Institute of Islamic Zeal was one of many private schools that were allowed to continue operating despite evidence of extremism.

I hope that my report will help to bring about change.

I went to the school that created the San Bernardino killer.

ALIYAH SALEM

The year was 2014. Andrei Jeya, an 18-year-old Australian Muslim, was killed by a police officer in a Sydney police station. Jeya had been arrested on suspicion of terrorism and was kept in custody for 10 days. He was the first Australian to be killed by police in the course of an anti-terror investigation.

The police officer who shot Jeya was subsequently acquitted of murder.

Jeya had been a student at the Institute of Islamic Zeal, a private school in Sydney run by the anti-terror group Islamic Movement of Australia. The school, which was founded in 2009 by Islamic Movement of Australia co-founder Ali Alharbi, is closed now.

The Institute of Islamic Zeal was shut down in 2015 after it was revealed that some of its alumni had been involved in terrorism.

In the months leading up to Jeya’s death, there were reports of students being indoctrinated into extremist ideologies.

I visited the school to see what it was like. It was closed, but I was able to talk to former students and teachers.

They described a school where students were taught to hate their enemies and were encouraged to join militant groups.

I also spoke to some of the students who had been expelled from the school.

They told me that they had been subjected to bullying and were threatened with violence.

I was shocked by what I heard.

Scholars have been calling for the closure of such schools for years.

But the authorities have been slow to act.

The Institute of Islamic Zeal was one of many private schools that were allowed to continue operating despite evidence of extremism.

I hope that my report will help to bring about change.

I went to the school that created the San Bernardino killer.

ALIYAH SALEM

The year was 2014. Andrei Jeya, an 18-year-old Australian Muslim, was killed by a police officer in a Sydney police station. Jeya had been arrested on suspicion of terrorism and was kept in custody for 10 days. He was the first Australian to be killed by police in the course of an anti-terror investigation.

The police officer who shot Jeya was subsequently acquitted of murder.

Jeya had been a student at the Institute of Islamic Zeal, a private school in Sydney run by the anti-terror group Islamic Movement of Australia. The school, which was founded in 2009 by Islamic Movement of Australia co-founder Ali Alharbi, is closed now.

The Institute of Islamic Zeal was shut down in 2015 after it was revealed that some of its alumni had been involved in terrorism.

In the months leading up to Jeya’s death, there were reports of students being indoctrinated into extremist ideologies.

I visited the school to see what it was like. It was closed, but I was able to talk to former students and teachers.

They described a school where students were taught to hate their enemies and were encouraged to join militant groups.

I also spoke to some of the students who had been expelled from the school.

They told me that they had been subjected to bullying and were threatened with violence.

I was shocked by what I heard.

Scholars have been calling for the closure of such schools for years.

But the authorities have been slow to act.

The Institute of Islamic Zeal was one of many private schools that were allowed to continue operating despite evidence of extremism.

I hope that my report will help to bring about change.