Selfie-serving way of modern narcissist

The world is full of narcissists. They take selfies and post them on social media, seeking validation and admiration from others. These images are a reflection of their self-centered nature.

In today's digital age, the narcissist has found a new platform to showcase their ego. The selfie has become the currency of self-expression, a way to assert their presence in the world and celebrate their individuality.

With each tap of the shutter, the narcissist captures a moment that reinforces their self-image. These selfies are not just photographs; they are statements, declarations of their existence and their value.

The narcissist's selfie is not just a representation of themselves but a performance, a deliberate act of self-presentation. They select the perfect angle and light, composing their image to create the most flattering representation of their identity.

In this way, the narcissist's selfie becomes a tool for self-promotion, a method to influence how others perceive them. They are not just capturing memories; they are shaping their legacy.

The narcissist's selfie is a modern manifestation of the ancient practice of self-aggrandizement. From the days of ancient Egypt, where pharaohs adorned their temples with grand statues, to the contemporary selfie, the narcissist continues this tradition of self-promotion and self-esteem.

In conclusion, the selfie is a testament to the narcissist's relentless pursuit of validation and attention. It is a mirror reflecting not only their outward appearance but also their inner desires for recognition and admiration. The selfie is more than just a photograph; it is a declaration of their narcissistic nature, a manifestation of their constant need for self-affirmation.
